

GIRL ROBBED ON CAR DIDN'T KNOW UNTIL DETECTIVE TOLD HER

Then She Pleaded for Young Pickpocket, Caught as He Jumped Off.

An undersized youth jumped nimbly from a west-bound Fourteenth street car as it approached Sixth avenue today, dodged around the end of the platform, and sprinted for the sidewalk. Right after him came two husky men, who grabbed him by the arms and brought him up standing in his tracks. "Stop the car!" called one of the men to the conductor. "We're detectives." The conductor stopped the car. Detectives Cassano, one of the two, climbed aboard, while his partner, McKenna, held the youth in the street. Cassano asked Miss Eleanor Hubbard, a typewriter, on her way to work, to step off the car. "Your pocket has been picked," he said. The girl put her hand in her pocket. Her purse was gone. She left the car, and McKenna flashed the purse out of the pocket of the youth, who promptly dropped to his knees and began to sob. "Don't prosecute, miss," he begged. "I've been out of work, and I was on my way up to Harlem to get a job, but I had no carfare and when I saw your purse I couldn't help stealing it."

Miss Hubbard, moved by the tears of the youth, said she didn't want to prosecute. She went further and offered to give him half the money in the purse if the detectives would let him go. But the detectives insisted on taking their captive to Police Headquarters and on Miss Hubbard going along. Finally she consented and later she appeared in Jefferson Market Court as complainant against the prisoner, who said he was Harry Brenner, nineteen, of No. 87 Second avenue. The purse contained ten cents.

SAFE-BLOWERS WRECK DRUG STORE TO GET $547.

Jewelry Valued at $700 Is Also Part of Loot in Daring Williamsburg Robbery.

Safe-blowers got into the drug store of Henry M. Fesser, at No. 660 Grand street, Williamsburg, early to-day, and carried off $547 and jewelry valued at $700, after they had almost wrecked the store with an overcharge of nitroglycerine. Lights burn brightly in the drug store all night, and in its glare the burglars, who had climbed over fences from Manhattan avenue and prised away the bars protecting the rear windows, wheeled the big five-foot safe behind the prescription counter. The heavy doors were bored and piles of wet newspaper banded around the safe to deaden the sound. But the explosion shook the building and rattled windows for blocks around. Every one in the neighborhood heard the detonation, apparently, but the police. Bottles came crashing down from their shelves and splattered chemicals over the floor. Showcases were smashed and the prescription counter itself overturned. The doors of the safe were blown into the middle of the room. Despite all the noise, the robbery was not discovered until Mr. Fesser came to open the store at 8 o'clock.
